

Vegas

rock formations, and though the landing areas are wide off the tee, the putting surfaces are tougher to read than James Joyce's Ulysses. Even accomplished players will find themselves three-putting during a round at Wolf Creek.

An enticing addition in Mesquite nowadays is the new Conestoga Golf Club, a Gary Panks-designed course that meanders through natural arroyos and features dramatic elevation changes.

Continuing north on Interstate 15 beyond Mesquite, golfers should definitely check out the Red Rock Golf Trail in St. George, Utah. There are nine courses here that are part of the trail, but I suggest heading straight to the brand-new Sand Hollow course, a masterful John Fought design that features a series of four back-nine holes carved from red rock ledges and overlooking a green river valley. Definitely a WOW.

Once visited, it's certainly tempting to make St. George a separate trip altogether. With the city's proximity to Zion National Park (30 minutes), nine courses to play and a couple of destination spas, one could spend several very satisfying days in St. George.

On your way to or from Las Vegas, don't forget to stop at Primm Valley Golf Club on the California side. The Lakes and Desert courses, designed by Tom Fazio, are true desert gems and an oasis at State Line.

It's fair to say that until recently, Las Vegas was a place where golf was no more than an afterthought if you could pull yourself away from other pursuits long enough. Nowadays, though, Las Vegas and its environs have become a full-fledged golf destination, with courses of every variety and in every price range.

The family theme is long gone. Las Vegas is back to being everybody's craziest fantasy — even if it's one you wouldn't want your kids to know about. Who among us doesn't want to be a star? To have our 15 minutes of fame? In Las Vegas, you can dress the part, talk the part and act like a celebrity ... for a price.

On the other hand, if great golf is your prime motivation, you've likewise come to the right place. It's all a matter of perception.
